

Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD)

This resource explains what post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and complex PTSD are, and provides information on how you can access treatment and support. Includes self-care tips and guidance for friends and family.

If you require this information in Word document format for compatibility with screen readers, please email: publications@mind.org.uk

Contents

What is PTSD?	2
When is it diagnosed?	2
Are there different types of PTSD?	3
Experiences of facing stigma	3
What are the symptoms?	4
Common symptoms of PTSD	4
What are flashbacks?.....	5
Other impacts of PTSD	6
PTSD and other mental health problems	6
What causes PTSD?.....	7
Are some people more at risk of PTSD?	8
What is complex PTSD?	8
What causes complex PTSD?	9
What treatments are there?	10
How can I help myself?.....	10

Get to know your triggers	11
Confide in someone.....	11
Give yourself time	12
Try peer support	12
Find specialist support.....	12
Look after your physical health.....	12
What treatments are available?.....	13
Talking treatments for PTSD	13
Medication for PTSD	14
Other treatment options.....	14
Accessing treatment	15
How can friends and family help?.....	15
Listen to them.....	15
Try not to judge.....	16
Learn their triggers	16
Respect their personal space.....	16
Look out for warning signs	16
Help them to find support.....	17
Look after your own mental health.....	17
Useful contacts.....	18

What is PTSD?

Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is a type of anxiety disorder which you may develop after being involved in, or witnessing, traumatic events. The condition was first recognised in war veterans and has been known by a variety of names, such as 'shell shock'. But it's not only diagnosed in soldiers – a wide range of traumatic experiences can cause PTSD.

“When something traumatic happens in your life it rocks you to the core. The world is no longer a safe place. It becomes somewhere that bad things can and do happen.”

When is it diagnosed?

When you go through something you find traumatic it's understandable to experience some symptoms associated with PTSD afterwards, such as feeling numb or having trouble sleeping. This is sometimes described as an 'acute stress reaction'.

Many people find that these symptoms disappear within a few weeks, but if your symptoms last for longer than a month, you might be given a diagnosis of PTSD. Your GP might refer you to a specialist before this if your symptoms are particularly severe.

"I started experiencing symptoms of PTSD after my boyfriend died. I suffered extremely vivid flashbacks that could happen at any time, anywhere, and were deeply distressing... I threw myself into another relationship very quickly to try and avoid how I was feeling, but then also would not express much affection to my new partner."

Are there different types of PTSD?

If you are given a diagnosis of PTSD, you might be told that you have mild, moderate or severe PTSD. This explains what sort of impact your symptoms are having on you currently – it's not a description of how frightening or upsetting your experiences might have been.

PTSD may be described differently in some situations:

- Delayed-onset PTSD – if your symptoms emerge more than six months after experiencing trauma, this might be described as 'delayed PTSD' or 'delayed-onset PTSD'.
- Complex PTSD – if you experienced trauma at an early age or it lasted for a long time, you might be given a diagnosis of 'complex PTSD'. (See our page on complex PTSD for more information.)
- Birth trauma – PTSD that develops after a traumatic experience of childbirth is also known as 'birth trauma'. (See our page on PTSD and birth trauma for more information.)

If you experience some PTSD symptoms while supporting someone close to you who's experienced trauma, this is sometimes known as 'secondary trauma'.

"I couldn't understand why I felt like my brain wasn't functioning – I couldn't remember things, I couldn't process things. It was like my brain had just slowed down and ground to a halt."

Experiences of facing stigma

There are lots of misconceptions about PTSD. For example, people may wrongly assume it means you are 'dwelling' on past events. They might even suggest that you should 'get over it' or 'move on'. But having PTSD isn't a choice or a sign of weakness, and it's important to remember that you are not alone.

(See our page on stigma and misconceptions for lots of ideas on how to deal with stigma.)

What are the symptoms?

This page covers:

- Common symptoms of PTSD
- What are flashbacks?
- Other impacts of PTSD
- PTSD and other mental health problems

Each person's experience of PTSD is unique to them. You might have experienced a similar type of trauma to someone else, yet be affected in different ways.

Common symptoms of PTSD

These are some common signs and symptoms that you might recognise:

Reliving aspects of what happened	This can include: <ul style="list-style-type: none">• vivid flashbacks (feeling like the trauma is happening right now)• intrusive thoughts or images• nightmares• intense distress at real or symbolic reminders of the trauma• physical sensations such as pain, sweating, nausea or trembling
Alertness or feeling on edge	This can include: <ul style="list-style-type: none">• panicking when reminded of the trauma• being easily upset or angry• extreme alertness, also sometimes called 'hypervigilance'• disturbed sleep or a lack of sleep• irritability or aggressive behaviour• finding it hard to concentrate – including on simple or everyday tasks• being jumpy or easily startled• self-destructive behaviour or recklessness• other symptoms of anxiety
Avoiding feelings or memories	This can include: <ul style="list-style-type: none">• feeling like you have to keep busy• avoiding anything that reminds you of the trauma• being unable to remember details of what happened

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • feeling emotionally numb or cut off from your feelings • feeling physically numb or detached from your body • being unable to express affection • using alcohol or drugs to avoid memories
Difficult beliefs or feelings	This can include: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • feeling like you can't trust anyone • feeling like nowhere is safe • feeling like nobody understands • blaming yourself for what happened • overwhelming feelings of anger, sadness, guilt or shame

“The lack of sleep and the sense of never being at peace are exhausting.”

Why does PTSD have physical effects?

This could be because when we feel stressed emotionally, our bodies release hormones called cortisol and adrenaline. This is the body's automatic way of preparing to respond to a threat (sometimes called the 'fight or flight' response).

Studies have shown that someone with PTSD will continue producing these hormones when they're no longer in danger, which is thought to explain some symptoms such as extreme alertness and being easily startled.

“I thought I was coping quite well to start with. Then a few weeks after the event, I began experiencing unpleasant physical symptoms, similar to those of a heart attack: chest pain, tightness and dizzy spells so severe that I thought I would pass out [...] my heart was constantly racing and I felt permanently dizzy. I couldn't leave the house and became afraid of going to sleep as I was convinced I was going to die.”

What are flashbacks?

A flashback is a vivid experience in which you relive some aspects of a traumatic event or feel as if it is happening right now. This can sometimes be like watching a video of what happened, but flashbacks do not necessarily involve seeing images, or reliving events from start to finish. You might experience any of the following:

- seeing full or partial images of what happened
- noticing sounds, smells or tastes connected to the trauma

- feeling physical sensations, such as pain or pressure
- experiencing emotions that you felt during the trauma.

You might notice that particular places, people or situations can trigger a flashback for you, which could be due to them reminding you of the trauma in some way. Or you might find that flashbacks seem to happen at random. Flashbacks can last for just a few seconds, or continue for several hours or even days.

(You can read some tips on how to cope with flashbacks on our page on self-care for PTSD.)

“I feel like I’m straddling a timeline where the past is pulling me in one direction and the present another. I see flashes of images and noises burst through, fear comes out of nowhere... my heart races and my breathing is loud and I no longer know where I am.”

Other impacts of PTSD

If you are experiencing symptoms of PTSD, you might also find that you have difficulty with some everyday aspects of your life, such as:

- looking after yourself
- holding down a job
- maintaining friendships or relationships
- remembering things and making decisions
- your sex drive
- coping with change
- simply enjoying your leisure time.

If you drive you may have to tell the DVLA that you have PTSD. (For more information on your right to drive, including when and how to contact the DVLA, see our legal pages on fitness to drive.)

“My behaviour changed and became erratic. I would alternate from wanting to shut myself away and not see or talk to anyone to going out to parties in the middle of the week and staying out late.”

PTSD and other mental health problems

It's common to experience other mental health problems alongside PTSD, which could include:

- other anxiety disorders
- depression
- dissociative disorders
- self-harm
- suicidal feelings.

“I was also deeply depressed and experiencing huge amounts of anxiety, refusing to go anywhere alone or go near any men that I didn’t know... [I] would lock my bedroom windows and barricade my bedroom door at night.”

(See our pages on anxiety and panic attacks, sleep problems, phobias, depression, dissociative disorders, self-harm and suicidal feelings for more information on these topics.)

What causes PTSD?

The situations we find traumatic can vary from person to person. There are many different harmful or life-threatening events that might cause someone to develop PTSD. For example:

- being involved in a car crash
- being violently attacked
- being raped or sexually assaulted
- being abused, harassed or bullied
- being kidnapped or held hostage
- seeing other people hurt or killed, including in the course of your job
- doing a job where you repeatedly see distressing images or hear details of traumatic events
- traumatic childbirth, either as a mother or a partner witnessing a traumatic birth
- extreme violence or war, including military combat
- surviving a terrorist attack
- surviving a natural disaster, such as flooding or an earthquake
- being diagnosed with a life-threatening condition
- losing someone close to you in particularly upsetting circumstances
- learning that traumatic events have affected someone close to you (sometimes called secondary trauma)
- any event in which you fear for your life.

“I was mugged and then about a year later I was on the Tube when the police were trying to arrest someone who had a gun. In neither experience was I physically injured – although in the second one I thought I was going to die and that I was going to see lots of other people die.”

Secondary trauma

If you experience symptoms of PTSD while supporting someone close to you who has experienced trauma, this is sometimes known as ‘secondary trauma’ or ‘secondary traumatic stress’.

‘Secondary’ means that although the original (primary) trauma happened to someone else, the impact it’s having in your life is traumatic for you. It doesn’t mean it’s any less significant than any other kind of PTSD, or any easier to deal with. Our page for friends and family has some tips on looking after yourself.

Repeatedly witnessing or hearing about traumatic events in the course of your job is also sometimes called 'secondary trauma', although this experience is increasingly thought of by professionals as an original (primary) trauma.

Are some people more at risk of PTSD?

Some factors may make you more vulnerable to developing PTSD, or may make the problems you experience more severe, including:

- experiencing repeated trauma
- getting physically hurt or feeling pain
- having little or no support from friends, family or professionals
- dealing with extra stress at the same time, such as bereavement or money worries
- previously experiencing anxiety or depression.

If you experienced trauma at an early age or you have experienced long-lasting or multiple traumas, you might be given a diagnosis of complex PTSD. (See our page on complex PTSD for more information.)

“I was diagnosed by my GP with PTSD a few weeks after the death of my father who died very suddenly, following a family outing to the local pub for lunch. He collapsed in front of us and we had to administer CPR at the scene while waiting for the ambulance. He died later on the way to hospital.”

Anyone can experience traumatic events, but you may be particularly likely to have experienced trauma if you:

- work in a high-risk occupation, such as the emergency services or armed forces
- are a refugee or asylum seeker
- were taken into foster care.

(See our pages on how to manage stress, bereavement, abuse, money and mental health, anxiety and panic attacks and depression for more information on these topics. If you work in the emergency services, our Blue Light Programme is here to support you.)

What is complex PTSD?

Complex post-traumatic stress disorder (complex PTSD, sometimes abbreviated to c-PTSD or CPTSD) is a condition where you experience some symptoms of PTSD along with some additional symptoms, such as:

- difficulty controlling your emotions
- feeling very hostile or distrustful towards the world

- constant feelings of emptiness or hopelessness
- feeling as if you are permanently damaged or worthless
- feeling as if you are completely different to other people
- feeling like nobody can understand what happened to you
- avoiding friendships and relationships, or finding them very difficult
- often experiencing dissociative symptoms such as depersonalisation or derealisation
- regular suicidal feelings.

Other terms for complex PTSD

Complex PTSD is a fairly new term. Professionals have recognised for a while that some types of trauma can have additional effects to PTSD, but have disagreed about whether this is a form of PTSD or an entirely separate condition, and what it should be called.

For example, you may find some doctors or therapists use one of the following terms:

- enduring personality change after catastrophic experience (EPCACE)
- disorders of extreme stress not otherwise specified (DESNOS) – this term is more common in America than the UK.

“At times I felt that nothing was going to end the distress I was feeling, experiencing more than 10 flashbacks a day of the abuse I suffered as a child. It was a long process of recovery, with lots of bumps along the road, but the right medication and long-term therapy with someone I came to trust, has changed my life.”

Complex PTSD and emotional flashbacks

If you have complex PTSD you may be particularly likely to experience what some people call an 'emotional flashback', in which you have intense feelings that you originally felt during the trauma, such as fear, shame, sadness or despair. You might react to events in the present as if they are causing these feelings, without realising that you are having a flashback.

(See our sections What are flashbacks? and tips for coping with flashbacks for more information.)

What causes complex PTSD?

The types of traumatic events that can cause complex PTSD include:

- childhood abuse, neglect or abandonment
- ongoing domestic violence or abuse
- repeatedly witnessing violence or abuse
- being forced to become a sex worker
- torture, kidnapping or slavery
- being a prisoner of war.

You are more likely to develop complex PTSD if:

- you experienced trauma at an early age

- the trauma lasted for a long time
- escape or rescue were unlikely or impossible
- you have experienced multiple traumas
- you were harmed by someone close to you.

“Developing PTSD after experiencing domestic violence was not something I was prepared for. Physically I left my old home. Mentally I am still there. The prison is no longer that house – it is my mind. My thoughts. My memories. Memories I don't wish to bury but that are in my mind more than I can control.”

Misdiagnosis with BPD

Some of the symptoms of complex PTSD are very similar to those of borderline personality disorder \(BPD\), and not all professionals are aware of complex PTSD. As a result, some people are given a diagnosis of BPD or another personality disorder when complex PTSD fits their experiences more closely. It's also possible to experience both complex PTSD and BPD at the same time.

If you're worried that the diagnosis you've been given doesn't fit the way you feel, it's important to discuss it with a mental health professional so you can make sure you're getting the right treatment to help you.

(See our pages on borderline personality disorder and personality disorders for more information on these diagnoses. Our pages on seeking help for a mental health problem provide information on how to make sure your voice is heard, and what you can do if you're not happy with your doctor.)

What treatments are there?

The National Institute for Health and Care Excellence \(NICE\) – the organisation that produces guidelines on best practice in health care – has not yet developed recommendations specifically for complex PTSD. They caution that the existing guidelines for PTSD weren't developed for this kind of diagnosis.

You may find standard treatments for PTSD helpful, but many people with complex PTSD need more long-term, intensive support to recover. The treatment you are offered may depend on what's available in your local area. (See our treatments page for more about seeking help for PTSD or complex PTSD.)

How can I help myself?

Living with PTSD can feel overwhelming. This page offers some practical suggestions for looking after yourself.

- Get to know your triggers
- Confide in someone
- Give yourself time
- Try peer support

- Find specialist support
- Look after your physical health

Tips on coping with flashbacks

Flashbacks can be very distressing, but there are things you can do that might help. You could:

- Focus on your breathing. When you are frightened, you might stop breathing normally. This increases feelings of fear and panic, so it can help to concentrate on breathing slowly in and out while counting to five.
- Carry an object that reminds you of the present. Some people find it helpful to touch or look at a particular object during a flashback. This might be something you decide to carry in your pocket or bag, or something that you have with you anyway, such as a keyring or a piece of jewellery.
- Tell yourself that you are safe. It may help to tell yourself that the trauma is over and you are safe now. It can be hard to think in this way during a flashback, so it could help to write down or record some useful phrases at a time when you're feeling better.
- Comfort yourself. For example, you could curl up in a blanket, cuddle a pet, listen to soothing music or watch a favourite film.
- Keep a diary. Making a note of what happens when you have a flashback could help you spot patterns in what triggers these experiences for you. You might also learn to notice early signs that they are beginning to happen.
- Try grounding techniques. Grounding techniques can keep you connected to the present and help you cope with flashbacks or intrusive thoughts. For example, you could describe your surroundings out loud or count objects of a particular type or colour. (See our page on self-care for dissociative disorders for more information on grounding techniques.)

“You can't stop the waves but you can learn to surf; through my PTSD recovery journey I've learnt that emotions come and go in waves [...] it's best not to fight against them but ride with them.”

Get to know your triggers

You might find that certain experiences, situations or people seem to trigger flashbacks or other symptoms. These might include specific reminders of past trauma, such as smells, sounds, words, places or particular types of books or films. Some people find things especially difficult on significant dates, such as the anniversary of a traumatic experience.

Confide in someone

Lots of people who experience PTSD find it hard to open up to others. This may be because you feel unable to talk about what has happened to you. However, you don't need to be able to describe the trauma to tell someone how you are currently feeling.

It could help to talk to a friend or family member, or a professional such as a GP or a trained listener at a helpline. (See our page on telephone support for more information about helplines.)

Give yourself time

Everyone has their own unique response to trauma and it's important to take things at your own pace. For example, it may not be helpful to talk about your experiences before you feel ready. Try to be patient with yourself and don't judge yourself harshly for needing time and support to recover from PTSD.

Try peer support

Peer support brings together people who have had similar experiences, which some people find very helpful. (See our pages on peer support for more information about what it involves and how to find a peer support group to suit you.)

“Hope. There is always hope. With the right treatment and support, things will get better. I’m a living testament.”

Find specialist support

You might find it useful to contact an organisation that specialises in advice and support for PTSD, such as ASSIST Trauma Care. It could also be helpful to find an organisation with expertise in the particular type of trauma you have experienced. (See our useful contacts page for details of relevant organisations.)

Look after your physical health

Coping with PTSD can be exhausting. You might feel like you can't find the energy to take care of yourself, but looking after your physical health can make a difference to how you feel emotionally. For example, it can help to:

- Think about your diet. Eating regularly and keeping your blood sugar stable can help you cope when things feel difficult. (See our pages on food and mood for more information.)
- Try to exercise. Exercise can be really helpful for your mental wellbeing. (See our pages on physical activity for more information.)
- Spend time outside. The outside world might feel overwhelming, but spending time in green space can boost your wellbeing. (See our pages on ecotherapy for more information.)
- Avoid drugs and alcohol. While you might want to use drugs or alcohol to cope with difficult feelings, memories or physical pain, they can make you feel worse in the long run. They can also make other problems worse, such as difficulty sleeping. (See our pages on recreational drugs and alcohol for more information.)

PTSD and sleep problems

Lots of people who experience PTSD have problems sleeping. You might find it hard to fall or stay asleep, feel unsafe during the night, or feel anxious or afraid of having nightmares. (See our page on coping with sleep problems for more information.)

“The things that helped me: I took up running (which helped me sleep, as it seemed to ‘clear’ the excess adrenaline); talking to lots of my friends and my sisters, again and again; giving up sugar and alcohol (I was using them as masks for my erratic behaviour)."

What treatments are available?

This page covers:

- talking treatments for PTSD
- medication for PTSD
- other treatment options
- accessing treatment

Watchful waiting

If you have had PTSD symptoms for less than four weeks or they are relatively mild, your GP might suggest an approach called 'watchful waiting' before offering you any treatment. This involves monitoring your symptoms yourself to see if things improve. In this case you should be offered a follow-up appointment within one month.

Talking treatments for PTSD

The National Institute for Health and Care Excellence \(NICE\) – the organisation that produces guidelines on best practice in health care – currently recommends two types of talking treatment for PTSD:

- Trauma-focused cognitive behavioural therapy (TF-CBT). This is a form of cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) specifically adapted for PTSD. NICE recommends that you are offered 8–12 regular sessions of around 50–90 minutes, seeing the same therapist at least once a week. (See our pages on CBT for more information about this therapy.)
- Eye movement desensitisation and reprocessing (EMDR). This is a fairly new treatment that can reduce PTSD symptoms such as being easily startled. It involves making rhythmic eye movements while recalling the traumatic event. The rapid eye movements are intended to create a similar effect to the way your brain processes memories and experiences while you're sleeping. (See the section on EMDR in our pages on talking treatments for more information about this therapy.)

NICE may recommend other talking treatments in future if they are found to help with PTSD, but more research is needed.

"One of the most disturbing things has been the feelings of aggression and anger towards anyone who looks like the person who attacked me... EMDR therapy has been massively helpful."

What if I don't feel better?

If the talking treatment you try doesn't seem to be helping, NICE suggests that you:

- tell your doctor or therapist you were expecting to feel differently
- ask if you need more treatment, or a different type of treatment.

Your doctor or therapist should offer you a second course of treatment or a follow-up appointment. You can read the full guidelines for PTSD in English or Welsh on the NICE website.

Medication for PTSD

People experiencing PTSD aren't routinely prescribed medication. However, you might be offered medication if:

- you also have depression
- you have sleep problems caused by PTSD
- you are unable or unwilling to try talking treatments.

If you are offered medication for PTSD, this will usually be an antidepressant. While PTSD is not the same as depression, this type of medication has been found to help. NICE recommends four antidepressants in particular:

- paroxetine – can be prescribed by a GP
- mirtazapine – can be prescribed by a GP
- amitriptyline – must be prescribed by a specialist
- phenelzine – must be prescribed by a specialist.

Some doctors may choose to prescribe other antidepressants for PTSD, such as sertraline. (See our pages on antidepressants for more information about this kind of medication.)

Before you take any medication

Before you decide to take any medication, you should make sure you have all the facts you need to feel confident about your decision. For guidance on what you might want to know about any drug before you take it, see our pages on:

- what you should know before taking any psychiatric drug
- receiving the right medication for you
- your right to refuse medication

Other treatment options

Some people with PTSD say they have found other treatments helpful in managing their condition, such as group therapy, arts therapies or dialectical behaviour therapy \(DBT\). However, the NICE guidelines say that treatments that have not been designed or properly tested for people who have experienced trauma should not be used on their own.

Pre-trial therapy for prosecution witnesses

The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) guidelines for vulnerable witnesses, which includes anyone giving evidence about rape or sexual assault, say that some forms of therapy can "present problems" if someone has them before giving evidence which may be used in a trial.

For information about this you can speak to Victim Support, which is a charity in England and Wales that aims to help victims and witnesses of any crime, or you could talk to an Independent Sexual Violence Advisor (ISVA) – The Survivors Trust has a list of ISVAs on their website.

Accessing treatment

Here are some ways you could access treatment:

- Your GP. To get treatment on the NHS, you could visit your doctor (also known as your GP). For advice on preparing for a GP appointment, see our Find the Words guide.
- Free NHS therapy services. You might be able to directly contact Improving Access to Psychological Therapies (IAPT) services in your area (if you live in England) – you can search for these on the NHS Choices website.
- Specialist organisations. See our useful contacts page for organisations that may offer therapy or be able to put you in touch with local services.
- Local trauma services. Some organisations offer free or low-cost trauma therapy. Your local Mind may have information about services in your area.
- Private therapists. Finding a private therapist is another option some people choose to explore.

(See our pages on seeking help for a mental health problem and talking treatments for more information about accessing treatment.)

How can friends and family help?

This section is for friends or family who wish to support someone who has PTSD. If you are a work colleague of someone who has PTSD, this section may also be useful for you.

It can be really hard to see someone you care about experiencing the symptoms of PTSD or complex PTSD. This page has some suggestions for ways you can support them while also looking after your own wellbeing.

Listen to them

If you feel able to, you could help by:

- giving them time to talk at their own pace – it's important not to pressure them
- allowing them to be upset about what has happened
- not making assumptions about how they feel
- not dismissing their experiences by saying "it could have been worse" or questioning why they didn't say or do something differently.

“No one around me understood what I was going through. I found it hard to explain. Words just couldn’t do justice to what I was going through.”

Try not to judge

If you've not experienced PTSD yourself, it can be hard to understand why your friend or family member can't seem to 'move on'. It's understandable to wish things could get back to normal, but it's important not to blame them or put pressure on them to get better without the time and support they need.

Learn their triggers

Each person will have a different experience of PTSD, so it might help to talk about what sorts of situations or conversations might trigger flashbacks or difficult feelings. For example, they might be particularly distressed by loud noises or arguments. Understanding their triggers could help you to avoid these situations, and feel more prepared when flashbacks happen.

Tips on helping someone who is experiencing a flashback

Flashbacks are vivid experiences in which someone relives aspects of a traumatic event. It can be hard to know how to help during a flashback, but you don't need special training to support someone who is having one. It could help if you:

- try to stay calm
- gently tell them that they are having a flashback
- avoid making any sudden movements
- encourage them to breathe slowly and deeply
- encourage them to describe their surroundings.

(See our sections What are flashbacks? and tips for coping with flashbacks for more information.)

Respect their personal space

People who experience PTSD may often feel jumpy or on edge. They may be easily startled or feel they need to constantly watch out for danger. It can help if you:

- avoid crowding the person
- don't touch or hug them without permission
- try not to startle or surprise them.

Look out for warning signs

You might see a change in the behaviour of the person you want to support. For example:

- a change in their mood, such as getting easily upset, angry or irritated
- a change in performance at work, such as lateness or missing deadlines
- a change in energy levels, such as extreme alertness or a lack of concentration.

If you notice these sorts of changes in someone close to you, you could ask them how they are feeling. This might encourage them to open up.

If you are an employer seeking to support someone in the workplace, see our information on taking care of your staff.

Help them to find support

If they want you to, you could help your friend or family member to find further support. For example:

- You could look through the list of relevant organisations in our page on useful contacts for PTSD.
- Our pages on supporting someone who is self-harming and supporting someone who feels suicidal can help if someone you care about is harming themselves or struggling with thoughts of suicide.
- If the person you want to support is a member of the emergency services, our Blue Light Programme is here to help.

Look after your own mental health

It's important to remember that your mental health matters too. Our pages on supporting someone else to seek help, how to cope when supporting someone else, managing stress and maintaining your wellbeing all have lots of information and tips on how to look after yourself.

Support options for you

A traumatic event can have a major impact not just on those who lived through it, but also on that person's close family, friends and colleagues. If you experience symptoms of PTSD yourself while supporting someone through a trauma (sometimes called secondary trauma), it might help to try some of the tips on our self-care for PTSD page.

It's also a good idea to talk to your GP about how you're feeling, and ask if they can offer you any treatment or support. The National Institute for Health and Care Excellence \(NICE\) (the organisation that produces guidelines on best practice in healthcare) says professionals should consider the impact of traumatic events on relatives and think about how to provide appropriate care.

Useful contacts

Mind's services

- Helplines – all our helplines provide information and support by phone and email. Our Blue Light Infoline is just for emergency service staff, volunteers and their families.
 - Mind's Infoline – 0300 123 3393, info@mind
 - Mind's Legal Line – 0300 466 6463, legal@mind
 - Blue Light Infoline – 0300 303 5999, bluelightinfo@mind
- Local Minds – there are over 140 local Minds across England and Wales which provide services such as talking treatments, peer support, and advocacy. Find your local Mind here, and contact them directly to see how they can help.
- Elefriends is a supportive online community for anyone experiencing a mental health problem. See our Elefriends page for details.

Anxiety UK

helpline: 0844 477 5774 (Monday–Friday 9.30am–5.30pm)

anxietyuk.org.uk

Support, help and information for those with anxiety disorders including PTSD.

ASSIST trauma care

helpline: 0178 856 0800

assisttraumacare.org.uk

Information and specialist help for people with PTSD and anyone supporting them.

Birth Trauma Association

birthtraumaassociation.org.uk

Support for anyone affected by birth trauma, including partners.

Combat Stress

helpline: 0800 1381 619 (24 hours)

combatstress.org.uk

Treatment and support for British Armed Forces Veterans who have mental health problems.

Disaster Action

disasteraction.org.uk

Information and support for people affected by major disasters in the UK and overseas.

Elefriends

elefriends.org.uk

A supportive online community which provides online peer support for anyone experiencing a mental health problem.

Freedom from Torture

freedomfromtorture.org

Provides direct clinical services to survivors of torture who arrive in the UK. Has access to interpreters.

HAVOCA (Help for Adult Victims of Child Abuse)

havoca.org

Information for adults who were abused in childhood, including an online support forum.

Lifecentre

helpline: 0800 802 0808

lifecentre.uk.com

Telephone counselling, support and information for survivors of sexual abuse and anyone supporting them.

Moodjuice

moodjuice.scot.nhs.uk

Free online self-help guide from the NHS which includes some self-help resources for PTSD.

The National Association for People Abused in Childhood (NAPAC)

0800 801 0331 (freephone, Monday–Thursday 10am–9pm and Friday 10am–6pm)

napac.org.uk

Support for adult survivors of any type of childhood abuse, including local support groups.

The National Institute for Health and Care Excellence (NICE)

nice.org.uk

Information and clinical guidelines on recommended treatments for different conditions, including PTSD.

NHS Choices

nhs.uk

Provides information on PTSD and complex PTSD, including local talk therapy services.

PTSD Resolution

0300 302 0551

ptsdresolution.org

Helps veterans, reservists and their families with trauma and distress.

RoadPeace

roadpeace.org

Helpline: 08454 500 355 (Monday–Friday 9am–5pm)

helpline@roadpeace.org

Information and support for those seriously injured by road crash and bereaved families.

The Survivors Trust

0178 855 0554

thesurvivorstrust.org

Lists local specialist services for survivors of sexual violence, including advocates and Independent Sexual Violence Advisors (ISVAs).

Victim Support

0800 168 9111

victimsupport.org.uk

An independent charity for people affected by crime and traumatic events in England and Wales. Provides emotional and practical help to enable people to cope and recover from the effects of crime.

© Mind 2018

To be revised in 2020.
References are available on request.